Through the Grapevine

“Speakeasies usually sell only beer and wine. The beer is seldom iced and the whiskey is as relentless as death. Recently an exception to the rule was found at 150 Fourth Avenue, this city, right in the shadow of Allegheny County’s two-million-five-hundred-thousand-dollar Temple of Justice. Here the police raid a speakeasy kept by Prof. Alexander Schoeb, a young teacher of music. His sweet-faced, blue eyed little wife was taken to the lock-up with him. The pair had fitted out three second-floor rooms with richly carved furniture and dainty gimcracks to make them attractive. Champagne and fine wines were served, and the house became a popular resort for young men and women who figure away up in the ordinary social scale. The place, the attendants, and the drinks had a peculiar charm. Besides, the house was so “eminently respectable” that only the “best people” were admitted.”

Local Beer & Cider

Councilman William Dessel of Beltzhoover Borough, Pennsylvania had a cool spring house of “peculiar excellence”.

He charged 10 cents to cool a keg, allowing folks to enjoy themselves in his garden. Noted the NY Times in 1891, “the resort has been disorderly for two years, and the only reason it wasn’t proceeded against was because the borough constable studiously refused to interfere.”

“Mount Pleasant (36 miles from Speakeasy Omni William Penn), a prohibition town of 2,000 people, is a hotbed of Irish, Hungarian and Italian speakeasies. Every Saturday three or four carloads of beer are delivered by railroad there.” By 1929, the Prohibition Bureau estimated the illicit production of homebrew at 22 million barrels (31 gallons per barrel) annually, nearly the same amount of legal beer sold in 1919. In some cities, so much homebrew was being made that sewer systems were choked beyond function by the onslaught of spent hops.
